Introduction to the Conference theme

Finance has evolved with time and it has transitioned from an unorganized field to professionally managed and defined field. The challenges in the transition were not easy ones. The traditional finance approach has gained momentum as it integrated modern processes through technology adaptation to stay relevant. Even more so in an event like black-swan during the COVID-19 pandemic induced new normal. The challenges it brought, have seen the magnitude of changes in the field of finance. The changes were on a need basis and are resultant of traditional and modern approaches not being sufficient, efficient, and relevant. This can be seen from the fiscal drag during these uncertain times yet capital gains in the financial market offsetting the losses to the investors. The early exits whether startups or business closures have been replaced by the new owners. The Brick-and-mortar retail stores and malls are seen replaced by the e-commerce rush almost overnight. The new normal has brought the significance of flexible processes as Finance that was well known from the public (budget and revenue process), personal (health, investing and saving), corporate (raising capital and redemption, value creation or additions and allocation of financial resources either to take or retain control) aspects are not the same. Everything that has been affected require review as the assessment tools which were once foolproof have failed to work.

The post-COVID metamorphosis in finance surely will need all the stakeholders to play our part in increasing the efficiency of each function rather than focusing on an institutional role. A green environment rather than red tape may better equip the finance to cope for black-swan like events such as the COVID-19 pandemic, in the hope that finally those changes will return to how it was in the pre-COVID era. Will the situation return back to normal or the persistence of the change lead to an era of post-COVID-19 metamorphosis?
