These life-threatening conditions often require stem cell transplants when conventional treatments like chemotherapy fail. DKMS-BMST, a global non-profit, has already facilitated over 140 transplants in India and registered 1.4 lakh potential donors, working to give patients a second chance at life. The drive educated students about the importance of registering as stem cell donors through a simple cheek swab for HLA (Human Leukocyte Antigen) typing, which helps identify matches for transplants. The non-invasive donation process, involving the collection of stem cells from the bloodstream, was explained in detail, dispelling fears and misconceptions. Students learned that their registration could be a vital step in addressing the global shortage of compatible donors. This initiative instilled a sense of responsibility among participants, highlighting how their small act of registering could save lives. For donors, the opportunity to directly impact someone's survival is profound, while for others, the drive inspires greater awareness and action against the stigmas surrounding blood cancer.
